

Russia and Its Crisis (Classic Reprint)

Lowell Institute in Boston, in December, 1904, during my second visit to this country. In the last pages of that chapter the events occurring in Russia during the months of December, 1904, and January, 1905, have been considered. But it gives me satisfaction to state that I have had nothing to add to my conclusion, which is published just as it was written in 1903, with the addition only of a few lines mentioning the subject of chap. vii. The reader may find it advisable, before perusing the book, to make himself acquainted with this conclusion, as it contains a summary, and points out the main thread, of the argument. I thought out and wrote this book in English, though I am fully aware how imperfect is my command of this beautiful language. Still, I think that this was a better method than to have had it translated from a Russian text. The most salient blunders have been removed by my English and American friends, and I avail myself of this opportunity to express my appreciation of the kind assistance rendered me by Miss E. M. Hughes, of England; Mr. Nott Flint and Dr. W. Muss-Arnolt, of the University of Chicago; Professor Leo Wiener, of Harvard University; and the reader of the University Press. On the other hand, I alone am answerable for such imperfections of style as may still remind the reader that the writer is a foreigner. My system of writing Russian names will be found to differ somewhat from the usual method. For instance, I write Keeyev, where an English writer is accustomed to find the spelling Kiev; Novoya Vraimya instead of Novoe Vremia; (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and do not occur in the book.)
